20 Study of the United States' Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) found that, among the 100 most polluted cities in the United States, the average annual per capita consumption of bottled water was 17.5 gallons. Assuming that the consumption of bottled water is normally distributed, and that the standard deviation is 3.5 gallons, what is the probability that a randomly selected city will have a per capita consumption of bottled water between 10 and 22 gallons?

It is possible to identify a few common themes in the research. First, the research is largely descriptive, focusing on the current state of affairs rather than on the underlying causes. Second, the research is largely quantitative, using surveys and statistical analysis to measure the prevalence of various factors. Third, the research is largely cross-sectional, focusing on a single point in time rather than on changes over time. Finally, the research is largely focused on the individual level, rather than on the organizational or societal level.

21. Study 3: Psychology (2001) Attention deficit and memory. The management of attention deficit disorder (ADD) involves medication, behavior therapy, and/or cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT). Some studies suggest that CBT is more effective than medication, but others suggest that medication is more effective than CBT. The purpose of this study was to determine the effectiveness of CBT in the treatment of ADD.

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of jobs. The study included 600 employees from a large manufacturing company who had been employed for at least one year. Data were collected through a self-administered questionnaire that asked about various factors related to work and health. The results showed that the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders was higher among workers in physically demanding jobs compared to those in less physically demanding jobs. This finding suggests that physical demands are a significant risk factor for developing musculoskeletal problems.
